It is better to have one strong, healthy, lateral branch, than three, or even four branches in the same space, which are slender and liable to decay in con sequence of close planting. Strong, stiff, lateral branches, witii the ends clipped off, and having thorns on their sides, are very repulsive things for stock of any kind to plunge into. But when all the sprouts grow erect and slender and smooth, bullocks with very long horns will delight in the fun of thrashing them to the ground. Any one who is well acquainted with the habits of the red cedar, or the hemlock, or American arbor vitae, will, I doubt not, fully coincide with me, that when planted very close together they could not be relied upon for making an efficient and impassable hedge; but if...
